Clym Yeobright decided he couldn't let another day pass without speaking to his mother about her differences with him and Eustacia. He left after (1)....., as the summer sun was too hot for the long walk to Blooms-End.

Three miles into the journey he came to a spot where a soft perfume wafted across his path, and he (2)..... still for a moment to (3) the familiar scent. While he stood, a (4)..... between quiet breathing and a moan suddenly reached his ears.

He looked to where the sound came from; but nothing appeared except the outline of some nearby shrubs. He moved a few steps in that (5)....., and now he perceived a figure by his feet.

It never (6)..... to Yeobright that it might be one of his own family. Field workers had been known to sleep outdoors at these times, to save a long journey homeward and back again. Clym looked closer and saw that the form was feminine; and a feeling of distress came over him like cold air from a cave. He was not certain the (7)..... was his mother until he stooped and beheld her face, pallid, and with closed eyes.

Clym held her, asked her what had happened, but she couldn't speak. The divide in their lives, which his love for Eustacia had caused, was not remembered by Yeobright. He thought only of the friendly past they had (8)..... together before the division.

Clym took his mother in his arms and tried to (9)..... her to Blooms-End. A mile from the house, his mother became restless. Fifty yards off stood an unused hut. He took his mother there, where he laid her inside on some dry ferns he had cut with his pocket-knife. Assured she would be safe for a short while, he ran with all his might towards Blooms-End for help.

Clym returned with Susan Nunsuch and Sam. They (10)..... Clym's mother with brandy, and she motioned that something was wrong with her foot. It was red and swollen. The colour was livid near the ankle with a small scarlet speck, smaller than a pea, in the centre. It was an adder snake bite. The only cure was to rub the wound with the fat of other adders which had to be fried from their bodies.
